The prophet had a dispensation bidding the saints gather up their goods preparatory to a flight into the wilderness, where they were to found a state in which they could practice their creed undisturbed. So Strang and his followers sailed for Beaver Island. The hardships they had experienced they inflicted on the unfortunate fishermen of the island, who were bundled into their boats and put off without compunction. Strang remained the island St. James. He at once set his followers at work on the foundations of a capitol for the colony, which was to be known as the City of St. James. It was located at the north end of the island, where a small bay formed a natural harbor, and where the government had built a lighthouse. In a short time quite a town was created. The principal buildings were the temple, a large one story building, and a substantial log palace for the prophet, who assumed the title of King. Here also was the prison where Strang used to confine his rebellious subjects as well as his enemies. Here the prophet performed the duties of both judge and executioner.

The Mormons by dint of hard labor made quite a respectable town of the island, and their principal occupation was fishing and "spoiling the Egyptians" on piracy in the lake. Strang started out missionaries, and the community increased until the estimated Mormon population of Beaver and adjoining islands over which they spread was nearly two thousand. They soon became very arrogant, and fights with their neighbors were frequent.

With or without the consent of the state authorities of Michigan, Strang organized a country in a portion of the island, in a portion of the main land opposite. He was elected sheriff and the other county officials were his creatures. These and other irregular proceedings were winked at for a time, and the Mormon leader even went so far as to take his seat in the Michigan legislature as the member from his district, sending objections by arraying himself on the side of the majority.

With the growth of the Mormon colony the brutalities of Strang's followers increased, murder being added to their other crimes. Frequently persons obnoxious to Strang were summoned to sit on a grand jury at St. James. The selected victim (generally made great haste to leave the country. The trial of the Mormons was marked. A warrant was issued against him in due form and placed in the hands of Mormon deputies for service. If the victim was caught he had

REALISM AT CAMP MEETING.

The colored people are holding a camp meeting at Urbana, and on Sunday Rev. Fleming Gray, formerly of Decatur, indulged in a piece of realism that would do no discredit to the most accomplished playwright of the day.

At South Boston, Jos. Hines, aged nineteen, while bathing, was drowned.

At Taunton, Patrick Clark, aged thirty-five, was drowned.

At Fall River, Charles Breloer, aged sixteen, was drowned while bathing.

At Worcester, Francis C. Ketter, aged eight, fell from a boat in Lake Quinsigamond and perished.

At Lawrence, Wm. J. Daves, aged twenty-six, a hair-dresser of Haverhill, slipped from a canoe and was drowned in the Merrimack.

short shift. Occasionally the deputies shot their victims without ceremony when found.
Two fishermen named Sullivan were known to have been disposed of in this manner.
When the Mormon fishermen visited their boats they made a point to rob any others that might be in the vicinity. The fish were always stolen and generally the nets.
In time St. James Island came to be a refuge for all sorts of rascals, who could there dispose of their plunder.
A Kautschukian making a midsummer trip up the lakes was one day leaning over the guards of the propeller as she lay moored to the dock. A team came up with a load of fish. Both horses were recognized by the Kautschukian as having been stolen from him a year before. "Those two horses belong to me," he said to an officer standing beside him. "For God's sake, don't say so on shore," was the quick reply. The horseman had no intention of placing his head in a lion's mouth, and wisely kept silent.

The first attempt to arrest the Mormon proprietor failed. The fishing vessel was when the government cruiser arrived at St. James. The boat was floating in a small boat out in the fog. There he remained some days, sleeping at night in remote parts of the island, until the cruiser departed. The second attempt was more successful. Strang was arrested and taken to Detroit, but was acquitted. Those incidents only served to advertise the colony, and drew to him many sentimentalists, especially women, among the latter being a lady of good family, high breeding and great intellectual attainments.
An attempt was made to show she had been abducted by Strang's followers, but she went on the witness stand and testified in Strang's behalf. Her testimony, beauty and elegance secured the release of her adored prophet.
At this time he was on the shady side of 40, of medium height, thin and wiry and very dark, and his spare face was framed with a heavy beard which he wore long, giving him a patriarchal appearance. His upper lip was always kept clean shaven, which gave his sensual mouth undue prominence.

Very few fishermen got out of Strang's clutches whole in body, to say nothing of belongings, after war was declared, and a Mormon boat was their greatest terror. Among the one who escaped alive from the Mormon king is James M., an old fisherman, still living on the Denver. He says:

"It was early in the spring of 1853, as near as I can recollect, when my partner and I started from Mackinac for Gull Island with 200 worth of supplies. I was starting when we started and we were glad enough to make the shank (local jargon for Wang-shank light) that night. We started early the next morning, but lost our course in the fog. After boating about all day we made Beaver Island. Hardly had we landed before we were surrounded by Mormons who made us walk up the beach. In a short time King Strang came down, issued a few orders, and twelve men separated from the rest.
Six of them began to examine their guns in a manner that sent the cold chills galloping up and down my back. They had been appointed to kill us. The others were to buy us. Then Strang placed a double-barreled shot gun to my breast, asked me more questions in regard to our intentions, issued our orders which proved to be to clear away the boat, remove all the sails and cars and eat us alive. We did not wait for the expiration of the ten minutes which we were allowed to get away in.
Luckily for us one of the crowd, more humane than the rest, had secretly thrown in some corn; but the boat was aground on a rock and we could not budge it. We went back to the group and asked some of them to help us off. One whispered in my ear to get away as soon as possible. There was no use, besides a storm had come up and I didn't believe my boat could hold the sea.
I went to Strang and begged to be allowed to stay. He told me coldly that unless we went we would be in a-l before daylight.

On this we thought we might as well be drowned as shot and managed to get off.
It was intensely cold and we were obliged to go for Mackinac. I don't know what day our chances were very tight and our sufferings were intense, but thanks to good constitutions we both recovered from the effects of the exposure, and had the pleasure a year later of taking part in the banishment of the Mormons from the island."

Before this the Mormons and fishermen, who had banded together, had met in more than a hundred battles. One of the first followed the departure of an expedition from King Strang's stronghold for the mainland.
An alarm was at once given by the fishermen and chase was given. When the Mormons landed the parties met and the Mormons scurry back to their boats with a few wounded. As soon as the Mormons were clear of the lake they laid their course for the Beaver. They were followed by the fishermen and the chase was continued until the Mormons reached the mainland. The wind almost died away, and a running fire was kept up all the time. Although the range was long, a number of Mormons were wounded. This left them short handed, and their complete destruction seemed almost inevitable, when the bark Morgan, Capt. Stone, hove in sight.
The Mormons headed for her and reached the bark in time to allow their occupants to clamber on board before the infuriated fishermen could come up. Once on deck they were safe and the pursuers gave up the chase.
The Mormons were taken by Capt. Stone near to the Beavers and cast adrift in their boats.

The worst blot on the page of the Mormon history of occupation was the murder of the entire crew of the brig Robert Willis, which disappeared in 1853. The last person to see the brig was Capt. John B. Merrill, of Chicago, who at the time was on Stillago (salor for Aux. Gale's Island, engaged in a wrecking expedition to the schooner Sovereign of the Sea. It was Thanksgiving afternoon, and a heavy snow storm was in progress. Baffled by the foggy atmosphere inside the lighthouse, the only building on the island, Mr. Merrill stopped outside. The island is barely an acre in extent, and he closed the door almost on top of him before the outburst of a brig which he recognized as the Willis. The storm had parted for an instant, leaving a patch of clear sky. The crew of the Willis seemed to climb the island at the same instant, and the brig at once went about on another tack and was lost to sight in the storm. That was the last ever seen of her or her crew. The brig was loaded with flour, pork and provisions.

Immediately after her disappearance Beaver Islanders were found to be well supplied with these articles. The report reached the authorities. While had gone ashore on the Beaver and such of her crew as were not drowned were put out of the way by the Mormons. A short time ago, in a little hollow in the sandy beach at the north end of the island, seven bleached and rusty skeletons were discovered. Among the island residents it was an accepted belief that the seven skeletons were all that remained of the crew of the brig Willis. They were reverently removed and carefully interred in the little village cemtery.

This supposed crime, with constantly increasing depredations, so fanned the indignation against Strang and his followers that finally an organized effort was made to drive them off the island. The United States authorities took a hand, and the steamer Michigan was ordered to the island. About this time, too, Strang's tyranny aroused rebellion on the island. As his power increased the Mormon leader did not hesitate to select for his wives the fairest of the new arrivals, and the sailing process was at times very loosely performed. Through and by this he fell.

THE LAST OF STRANG'S MEN.

he had appropriated without ceremony.
Benton revenge, the wronged husband joined hands with the fishermen. Suddenly, one morning after the arrival of the Michigan, a force of fifty fishermen, armed with muskets and shotguns, made a descent on the Beaver Island. Hardly had they landed before the surprised Mormons. Strang was shot on the wood dock as he was about boarding the Michigan by the husband whose wife he had stolen. With him fell the Mormon power on Beaver Island. It was with the exception of Strang's case, a bloodless conquest. It was said afterwards that so demoralized were the Mormons that ten resolute men could have taken the island. Their unexpected success stunned the victors in turn that there was very little display of lawlessness.

Terrified and thoroughly cowed, most of the Mormons hastily prepared for another exodus. Strang was carried to his house.
His wounds were believed to be fatal. Still, in spite of the pain he was suffering from the Mormon king calmly directed his followers in their preparations for flight.
The most of them left on the propeller Sam and the others left the Beaver, the next day to arrive. Strang was taken to Kenosha, Wis., where he died and where his bones still rest. Those of his followers who still cling to the Mormon faith found their way to Salt Lake City. Many fall by the wayside and become farmers here and there throughout the west. Others continued to live on the island and are there yet. The invaders presented the farms of the late owners and gradually King James and his colony were driven from the island. This is the story of the rise and fall of the little kingdom.
